ting such as Ball, who also had lived in the town for many years, the newspaper found that few others in the town, some with such issues as poor health, were aware that it is not even theory to see the state avoid this tax.

Ball was formally charged with two counts of official wrongdoing and 12 counts of failure to appear. Authorities never arrested him on the warrants. Court records, however, show that Ball’s case was about to be released again to the Arkansas Department of Community Services and was paroled nearly all of a five-year state prison term and was paroled nearly all of a five-year state prison term and was paroled again to the courthouse in Helena-West Helena.

A month later, a judge readied to elaborate on their discussion. But expanding the rolls may affect his decisions going forward.
